Gender-Blurring in Toni Morrison’s Novels I

Good morning, dear friends. In this week, we would begin our discussion with the concept of Gender-Blurring and after explaining the concept, we would move to a discussion of Toni Morrison’s work from this perspective. Our understanding of gender has started to change over a passage of time. It is not what it used to be, as we find that conventional categories have started to collapse.

What was considered to be deviant a couple of decades earlier has become a norm now and it is a result of various socio-cultural shifts. What used to exist only on the fringes of the society even two decades back has now become a part of our mainstream culture, media and educational and public policies are also being redesigned accordingly.

(Refer Slide Time: 01:30)

- Gender is not what it used to be. Categories are collapsing. What was deviant earlier, has become a norm now; resulting in cultural shifts – existing not on the fringes of society but also becoming a part of mainstream culture, media, education, policies etc.
- Blurring in gender boundaries is seen as a socio-cultural pattern, which has evolved over a passage of time.
- The initial differentiation between sex and gender is summed up by Freud as “anatomy is destiny”, indicating that gender is dependent on sex. Gender became a category of analysis by 1980s as feminist theory distinguished it from biological sex, establishing it as a cultural and discursive phenomena. Cultural differences are acknowledged. Thus it also allows the maximum interpretations of manhood and womanhood.
- Fuzziness about boundaries of male and female behavioural traits – where one ends and the other begins!

The initial differentiation between sex and gender; in the beginning of the 20th century has been summed up by Freud very appropriately. Freud had used the phrase “anatomy is destiny”, indicating that gender is dependent on sex. This was the perspective which was taken up by the first wave of feminist theories.

Later on, we find that by 1980's gender became a category of analysis. It was distinguished from biological sex, and was established as a cultural and discursive phenomena. It acknowledged the cultural differences and thus, it also allows maximum interpretations of what it means to be a man or a woman.

So, there is a fuzziness about boundaries of male and female behavioral traits. We do not know where one ends exactly and where the other begins. I would base my discussion on this understanding of the 1980's feminist theory which distinguishes gender from biological sex; but takes it as a cultural and discursive phenomena.

- Andrew Silverstein, “My Little Brony: Connecting Gender Blurring and Discursive Formations Colloquy”*, analyzes the 2010 popular TV series in this context.
- ‘My Little Pony’ is a toy and merchandise enterprise that first became popular in the ‘80s, but experienced resurgence in 2010 when the animated series “My Little Pony: Friendship is Magic” was launched by Hasbro in 2010.
- Although it was targeted at young girls, it quickly became popular among adult men and resulted in Brony movement -- a portmanteau word of bro + pony.
- The Bronies created a movement of men that embraced traits antithetical to societal norms, also became the subjects of much derision and fascination in equal measure.

* Colloquy . Vol. 9, Fall 2013, pp. 98-117.
https://www.calstatela.edu/sites/default/files/users/u2276/silverstein_essay6.pdf

I would refer to a very interesting article “My Little Brony, Connecting Gender Blurring and Discursive Formations Colloquy” in which Andrew Silverstein analyzes the 2010 popular TV series in this context. ‘My Little Pony’ is basically a toy as well as a merchandise enterprise which became popular in 1980's. But it experienced resurgence and a better popularity, when the animated series “My Little Pony: Friendship is Magic” was launched by Hasbro in 2010.

Though the series had targeted the young girls only, it quickly somehow became popular among adult men and this popularity resulted in what is known as the Brony movement. Brony is a portmanteau word of bro that is brother and pony.

So, the Bronies created a movement of men which enable them to embrace traits, which were antithetical to the societal understand of masculinity and they also became the subject of much derision as well as fascination in equal measures.

(Refer Slide Time: 04:05)

- It modifies gender identities and as a discursive formation can also be taken as a commentary about the U.S. society, even though its popularity has started to shrink by 2020. There is also an undeniable barrier to get through before one could accept the Bronies.
- The knowledge that is being created and discussed within the Brony community includes what it means to be masculine, how one can be friendly, how one can be tolerant, and how one can blur gender lines. The Brony community is aware that it is violating the accepted understanding of what it means to be male and attempts to break free of this understanding by valuing things that are identified by the general public to be feminine.
- After analyzing three main online forums, Silverstein also concluded that while the Bronies were attempting to break free of several gender roles at once, the societal formation of gender and gender hierarchies were still influencing them: use of gender specific and sexual slang.

This movement modified gender identities and as a discursive formation, it can also be taken as a commentary about the U.S. society, even though off late its popularity has started to shrink, still we find that it showcases a particular facet of contemporary American society. At the same time, we have to understand that there exists an undeniable barrier before one could accept the Brony movement.

The knowledge that is being created and also discussed within the Brony community includes what it means to be masculine, how one can be friendly and masculine simultaneously, how one can be tolerant, and how one can blur the gender lines. The Brony community is aware that it is violating the accepted understanding of what it means to be male and attempts to break free of this understanding by valuing things that are identified by the general public to be feminine.

Women are also a part of this movement, but it largely focuses on the participation of men. Silverstein has analyzed three main online forums which have discussed this particular movement over a passage of time. Interestingly, he concludes that though the Bronies have attempted to break free of several gender roles at once, the societal formation of gender as well as the accepted gender hierarchies were still influencing them in an unconscious manner. And this is reflected in their use of sexual slang and gender specific language.

(Refer Slide Time: 05:58)

- What is Gender-Blurring: Gender-blurring involves the conventional characteristics and dispositions of women and men. In the concept of gender blurring a man behaves as it is expected of a woman and a woman's behavior conforms more to the male character than to her own.
- Certain character traits are culturally considered to be associated with different genders. Katrin Rindchen in her article "Gender Blurring in Beloved by Toni Morrison" cites, in this context, Elizabeth Ann Beaulieu's "The Politics of Gender in Toni Morrison's Beloved: If 'a man ain't nothing but a man,' Then What is a Woman?" (<https://www.grin.com/document/107160>)
 - Masculine: fearlessness, aggression or confrontationist behavior, rational, active and brave. Feminine: binary opposite of the above.
 - Sexual behaviors are also related with class structures, wherein subordination of women is apparent (respectability + class in patriarchal codes)

So, what is Gender-blurring? Gender-blurring involves the conventional characteristics and dispositions of women and men. In the concept of gender blurring a man behaves as it is expected of a woman as per the conventional social norm and a woman's behavior confirms more to the male character than to her own.

Now, what exactly are the specific characteristics of a man or a woman? I would refer to Katrin Rindchen, who in her article, "Gender Blurring in Beloved by Toni Morrison" has given the example from another article by Elizabeth Beaulieu, "The Politics of Gender in Toni Morrison's Beloved :if 'a man ain't nothing but a man,' Then what is a woman?" And these writers have listed certain characteristics as being masculine and certain characteristics as being feminist.

If we look at their listing, we find that the listing is not exactly new; but they have tried to understand this listing at its significance in the context of Toni Morrison's writing. We understand that fearlessness, aggression or a confrontationist behavior is related with masculinity. A man is also expected to be rational, active as well as brave, a provider for one's family; a person who should be able to take care of one's family.

The feminine characteristics are the binary opposites. If a man is expected to be fearless, a woman is expected to be rather timid. She should value relationships and should not be aggressive; she should be emotional, passive etc. These sexual binaries are related not only with our culture, but also they are a part of our class structures.

But still, we find that within the class structures in these characteristics, the subordination of women is apparent. We also understand that the definitions of certain terms also changes according to the changes within the class structures. For example, the idea of respectability among women is defined in various ways depending on the class to which a woman belongs.

- Gender blurring has been a theme of youth-based subcultures since the 1960s.
 - For example, during the hippy movement, men grew their hair long, wore kaftans and beads and "got in touch" with their more feminine and spiritual side.
- Here, conventions of masculinity and femininity were flouted with men wearing make-up, sequins, feather boas and platform shoes, while female singers such as Patti Smith (not exactly glam rock, but very underground) adopted male attire in the form of suits, shirts and loosely draped ties.
- The punk rock era that followed was possibly more androgynous with the obligatory bondage trousers worn by both males and females, spiked hair, dog collars and collective adherence to the wearing of black.
- Concept of gender blurring is close to Drag and some aspects of Queer theory. Mainly understood as a concept employed in the genres of Neo- Slave Narrative and African American Fiction. Contextualizes the III wave.

We find that in the modern times gender blurring has been a theme of several youth-based subcultures. For example, the hippy movement during the 1960s, where the conventions of masculinity and femininity were flouted by cross dressing. The punk rock era that followed was perhaps more androgynous with the obligatory bondage trousers and closeness in their apparel choices.

Concept of gender blurring is close to the idea of the Drag and certain aspects of Queer theory. Even though it is mainly understood as a concept which has been employed to look at the genres of Neo-Slave Narrative and African American Fiction. We also find that this concept of gender blurring contextualizes the third wave of feminist from where we find that more contemporary understandings of the term gender have arisen. In order to understand the idea of gender blurring in a more detailed way, let us look at the concept of Drag and those aspects of Queer theory which are close to it.

(Refer Slide Time: 09:48)

- Drag or cross dressing has been used as a theatrical device since the days of Greek drama. In Shakespearean age also, women were not permitted to perform on the stage.
 - Thus, cross-dressing by male actors was an inevitable and essential practice to portray the female characters in a play.
- The use of cross-dressing performers in Shakespearean plays was used as an intentional tool of performance. It relied on the more acceptable gender characteristics of women, to separate masculinity from femininity.
 - In the Shakespearean play Twelfth Night, female-to-male cross-dressing occurs as Viola dresses in both male and female apparel: as herself and when disguising herself, when she takes on the identity of a man, Cesario.
- Initially modern critical theories viewed it as imprecise/exaggerated imitations of femininity, or later on, of masculinity on conventional stage or more recently in night clubs.

Drag or cross dressing is not a new phenomenon. It has been used as a theatrical device since the days of Greek drama. During the medieval times also women were not permitted to perform on the stage and in Shakespearean drama, we find that the characters of women were played on stage by men.

So, cross dressing in theater by male actors was inevitable and it became an essential practice to portray the female characters in a play. It was used thus as an intentional tool of performance and this performance relied on the more acceptable and visible gender characteristics of women so that the characteristics of women or the portrayal of women characters is separated from the portrayal of men character.

There is also an example of cross dressing by a woman. For example, Viola in Twelfth Night, when she takes up the identity of a man Cesario through cross dressing. Initially, modern literary critical theories viewed drag as an imprecise or exaggerated imitation of femininity or later on, of masculinity either on conventional stage only or more recently in the nightclub performances.

- Through acts of illusion that insist the outward appearance does not align with the inner self and body, drag has traditionally been and can continue to be, a context to perform an oppositional gender.
- However, many drag contexts challenge these aforementioned binary re-/presentations of drag, as Fenton Litwiller has commented*.
- Some examples include the offensively named 'bioqueens' (cisgender women who perform as drag Queens), transgender or genderqueer people performing as Queens or Kings, and transgender, genderqueer and cisgender people performing genderfuck (e.g., using sparkly beards to queer masculinity, or a combination of beards and skirts).
- Drag artists perform renditions of gender that have multiple and varied meanings for the artist and audience.
 - Multiplicity can also be understood by the emerging debates on Cross-Gender readings.

However, we find that now the drag is studied as a critical theoretical stance also. Through acts of illusion that insist the outward appearances does not align with the inner self and body, drag has traditionally been and can also continue to be a context to perform an oppositional gender. Many drag context challenge these aforementioned binary representations of drag as Fenton Litwiller has commented in his article.

Some examples include the offensively named 'bioqueens' who are cisgender women who perform as drag Queens, transgender or gender queer people performing as Queens or Kings and transgender genderqueer and cisgender people performing genderfuck that is using sparkly beards to queer masculinity or a combination of beards and skirts.

Drag artists perform renditions of gender that have multiple and varied meanings for the artist as well as for the audience and this multiplicity can be understood by the emerging debates on cross gender readings within the academia.

(Refer Slide Time: 12:43)

- Drag performances are understood within the particular context in which they are practiced and against contextual rules that create boundedness for the performance. The felt experience of the performer, therefore, is made possible by the social response and meaning-making of the audience. Cultural sites of enactment and the class position of performer could change interpretations.
- Litwiler comments that for many audiences that consume drag, there is desire, attraction, and a physical thirst for these non-normative gender expressions and identities. Drag performers who can illustrate the fictive nature of normative gender by mocking the gender framework are often granted a celebrity-like status.
- Judith Butler's theory of three layers of gender helps us in contextualizing such performative acts. It also helps us to better understand the idea of gender-blurring.

IT ROORKEE | NPTEL ONLINE CERTIFICATION COURSE | 9

Interpretation of drag performance is related with the particular context in which it is practiced and also, against contextual rules that create boundedness for the performance so that we cannot dissociate the cultural site of enactment from the performance because the site of enactment and the class position of performer would also change the interpretations. The felt experience of the performer is made possible by the social response as well as by the meaning making capability of the audience.

For many audiences as Litwiler has commented, the drag is desire; it is an attraction as well as a physical thirst for the non-normative gender expressions and identities. Drag performers, who can illustrate the fictive nature of normative gender by mocking the gender framework are often given a celebrity like status in contemporary cultural norms. Judith Butler's theory of three layers of gender also helps us in contextualizing such performative acts.

(Refer Slide Time: 14:01)

- According to Butler's theory, the biological sex of the performer, the gender identity of the performer, and the gender that is being performed are factors that are taken into consideration when examining a theatrical act in which the actor cross-dresses.
- Similarities can be found between Butler's theories on the performance of gender and the theories of Jean E. Howard, who argues that "the blurring of sexual differences opens the liberating possibility of undoing all the structures of domination and exploitation premised on binary sexual oppositions" (Howard 430).
- Gender and power structures can not be easily separated. They are interdependent and define each other in every society.
- Notion of gender is formed, framed and congealed into forms which appear to be natural and permanent, by discourses which also create patriarchal power structure.
- Associations of gendered behavior with race and class hierarchies.

IT ROORKEE | NPTEL ONLINE CERTIFICATION COURSE | 10

We would discuss Judith Butler in detail in some other modules; but at this point, Judith Butler's theory is important for understanding the interpretations of the drag performance. According to her, the biological sex of the performer, the gender identity of the performer and the gender that is being performed are factors that are taken into consideration when examining a theatrical act in which the actor cross dresses.

Similarities between Butler's theory on the performance of gender and the theories of Jean Howard can also be pointed out. Jean Howard has suggested that the blurring of sexual differences opens the liberating possibility of undoing the structures of domination and exploitation which are premised on binary sexual opposition. It can also be pointed out that gender and power structures cannot be separated. They are interdependent and define each other in every society.

Notion of gender is formed, framed and congealed into forms which appear to be natural and permanent by discourses which are also responsible for generating and perpetuating patriarchal power structures. At the same time, we find that associations of gendered behavior with race and class hierarchies also exist.

- Gender blurring and the Queer: oppose single heterosexual umbrella in terms of gendered characteristics.
- Are important, along with heterosexuality, to understand the practice of power within a society, shown by the dominance and oppressive relation between the two.
- Queer by definition is deviant and abnormal, rejecting to be grouped as straight.
- Queer's idea of the liminal space alerts us to the blurred boundaries between gender binaries. Binaries indoctrinate men to be aggressive, competitive and providers; while women are grooved into passivity and acceptance.
- Queer theory, as well as the concept of gender blurring challenges the fixities of such stereotypes.

IT ROORKEE | NPTEL ONLINE CERTIFICATION COURSE | 11

The notion of gender-blurring is also very close to certain aspects of the Queer. It opposes single heterosexual umbrella in terms of gendered characteristics. An understanding of gendered characteristics is significant to understand the contemporary notion of gender philosophy. Along with heterosexuality, they help us in understanding the practice of power within a society which is shown by the dominance and oppressive relationship between the binaries. Queer by definition is deviant and abnormal. It is considered to be a deviation and therefore, it is rejected to be grouped as straight.

Queer's idea of the liminal space alerts us to the blurred boundaries between the conventional gender binaries. Binaries indoctrinate men to be aggressive, competitive and provider for example; while women are grooved into passivity and acceptance. Queer theory as well as the concept of gender-blurring challenges the fixities of such stereotypes in practice.

- Gender blurring: especially used in the context of African-American women writers. In African American Novels and in the Neo-Slave Narrative the concept of Gender-Blurring was employed often, as it not only demonstrated this disadvantage of female slaves but also that men and women suffered equally under slavery.
- Slavery system was equally detrimental to women and men, however besides the equally harsh manual labor and physical circumstances, women also had to suffer extreme pain on account of their gender (breeder). Their pain in turn impacted their menfolk too.
- Toni Morrison, one of the major African-American writers, also illustrates this concept in several of her novels.
- Her character portrayal reveals the trauma of slavery with the help of the concept of gender-blurring.

Gender blurring is especially used in the context of African-American women writers. In African American novels as well as in the Neo-Slave Narratives, the concept of gender-blurring was often employed. It was employed not only to demonstrate the disadvantages of female slaves, but also to illustrate the point that men as well as women suffered equally under slavery.

Slavery system was detrimental to women and men and as we know besides sharing the equally harsh manual labor and other physical circumstances, women also had to suffer extreme pain on account of their own gender. They were treated as breeder. But the pain of the women folk in turn impacted their menfolk too. Toni Morrison, one of the major African-American writers, has illustrated this concept in several of her novels. Her character portrayals reveal the trauma of slavery with the help of the concept of gender-blurring and how it has impacted the psyche of men as well as women.

Toni Morrison (1931-2019)

- Toni Morrison is one of the leading figures in contemporary American fiction and the first black American woman to win the 1993 Nobel Prize for Literature.
- Maya Angelou has commented that “she has the insight of a shaman and the lyricism of a great poet” (Nobelprize.org)
- Morrison was born and brought up in the North, a free state where neither slavery nor racism flourished and was left untouched by the truth of racial segregation.
- When Morrison came to the South for higher education, she was surprised to see separate water fountains for blacks and whites; separation of seats in buses and trains by using bars.
- 11 novels, two short-fiction, poetry and non-fiction

Toni Morrison is a prolific writer. She has written 11 novels, two short-fiction, poetry as well as non-fiction also. Toni Morrison is one of the leading figures in contemporary American fiction and the first black American woman to win the Nobel Prize for literature. She was awarded it in 1993. Maya Angelou has commented that “she has the insight of a shaman and the lyricism of a great poet”.

In her growing up years, Morrison had never faced the ill effects of slavery herself. However, when she came to South for higher education, she was surprised to see the separation in practice between the two races. These experiences are recorded in her writings.

I did not discover why I wrote really until later at the very beginning, when I wrote the first book The Bluest Eye. I came at it as not a writer, but a reader and such a story did not exist. Every little homely black girl was a joke or did not exist in literature and I was eager to read about a story, where racism really hurts and can destroy you.

The Bluest Eye (1970)

- Deconstructing the myth of childhood innocence through Pecola, Morrison demonstrates the damaging impact of internalized racism in the context of social acceptance and construction of beauty.
 - It is a tragic story of child abuse, with race, gender and class mixed in; the novel is concerned with racial self-loathing, the loss of identity, and shame.
- Use of trans-generational past in her narrative, allows her to re-chronicle and reconstruct the past
- The title “The Bluest Eye” calls attention to itself immediately: the superlative degree of colour, as well as the singular form of the noun in the title is rather unusual, resulting in a pun.
- The singular noun may refer to the damaging white gaze; the omitted plural to the object of desire, an epitome of beauty according to mainstream society.

Morrison has written 11 novels. In our discussion, we would be focusing on those novels in which the concept of gender-blurring is more dominant. I would discuss first of all The Bluest Eye which was published in 1970. The Bluest Eye is a tragic story of child abuse with race, gender and class mixed in and the novel is also concerned with racial self-loathing, loss of identity and a sense of deep shame.

The myth of childhood innocence is deconstructed through the protagonist of the novel Pecola. In terms of its structure, The Bluest Eye is a very rich novel. Morrison has used trans-generational past inner narrative which has allowed her to re-chronicle and reconstruct the past. The title itself draws our attention to it. There is the superlative degree of color as well as the singular form of the noun which is rather unusual and it results into a pun.

The singular noun here may refer to the damaging white gaze, which is critical; the omitted plural to the object of desire, an epitome of beauty according to mainstream societal norms.

- Major criticism focuses on sexual violence. However, the dissolution of hegemonic masculinity in the context of Cholly Breedlove conveys the essence of gender blurring.
- He is portrayed as unemployed, alcoholic and abusive black father; contrasted with the presumably nice, well-off, absent, white father of Dick and Jane, the master of the lovely house described in the opening pages of the narrative who provides for his children and ensures that they are not ghosted.
 - The overweening presence of this reassuring white father is juxtaposed with Cholly's incompetence and worthlessness establishing the stereotypes of essentialist white and black masculinities.
- It can also be seen as a revenance or an uncanny returning of the two white men who had exploited Cholly's vulnerability years ago by catching him in his first act of love making and forcing him to carry on while they watched. It illustrates deliberate and systematic deconstruction of manhood during slavery.
- Male helplessness a central trope.

Major criticism of the novel has focused on sexual violence as well as racial abuse. However, the dissolution of hegemonic masculinity in the character portrayal of Cholly Breedlove also conveys the essence of gender blurring. He is portrayed as an unemployed, alcoholic and abusive black father, who rapes his own daughter. His portrayal is contrasted with the white father of Dick and Jane, a presumably nice, well-off, absent father, who is the master of the lovely house which is described in the opening pages of the novel. He provides for his children and ensures that they are not ghosted.

There is an overweening presence of this reassuring white father and it is juxtaposed with Cholly's incompetence and worthlessness establishing the stereotypes of essentialist white and black masculinities. This description and juxtaposition can also be seen as a revenance or an uncanny returning of the two white men, who had exploited Cholly's vulnerability years ago. They had caught him in his first act of lovemaking and when he tried to withdraw and run from the scene, he was forced by them to carry on, while they watched at gunpoint. It illustrates deliberate and systematic deconstruction of manhood during slavery. Helplessness of a black man in a dominantly white America is a central trope in the novel.

- The rape scene is complicated by other emotions from Cholly as well. He has a strangely awkward feeling of love for Pecola right before the rape—he looks at her and remembers Pauline as a young woman—and that feeling becomes so powerful that he rapes his own daughter. There is shame, but also a complete lack of understanding of parental love.
- He has experienced genuine suffering, having been abandoned in a junk heap as a baby and having suffered humiliation at the hands of white men. He is not free to love and be loved or to enjoy full dignity.
- Morrison exposes the emotional and vulnerable side of black man who are victims of racism and abuse in the hands of white men.
- Another example of gender-blurring is Claudia MacTeer, the outspoken and brave narrator, who is not severely impacted by gender/race restrictions.

The rape scene itself is complicated by several emotions on the part of Cholly also. He has a strangely awkward feeling of love for Pecola right before the rape. He looks at her and remembers his girlfriend Pauline as a young woman, and that feeling becomes so powerful that it pushes him to rape his own daughter. There is shame, but also a complete lack of understanding of parental love.

At the same time, we find that he has experienced genuine suffering. Abandoned as a child in a junk heap and having suffered humiliation continuously, he is not free to develop his feelings of love or his capability to be loved. Through his portrayal, Morrison has exposed the emotional and vulnerable side of black men, who are victims of racism and abuse. In his portrayal, we find that timidity and cowardice which are normally associated with the conventional characteristics of a woman are displayed.

Another example of gender blurring is Claudia MacTeer, the outspoken and brave narrator, who is not severely impacted by gender or race restrictions. In a society which values bravery in men, we find that a male character, Cholly is depicted as being a timid and a person who does not value his family. On the other hand, in the portrayal of Claudia, a woman we are shown a remarkable bravery and outspokenness.

- When Claudia is given a white doll she does not want, she dissects and destroys it.
- Claudia feels repulsion for dolls. She feels physically revolted by and secretly frightened of “those round moronic eyes, the pancake face, orange worms hair” (20).
- She goes on to recognize that she was supposed to see these dolls as models of beauty; that even magazines and window signs, along with girls and women of any age, based their standards of beauty on these blue-eyed and yellow-haired dolls, but she did not. Pecola, however, bases her entire understanding of female beauty on these dolls. She is obsessed with having eyes like they do.
- The contrasting family stories: Claudia’s family, one clearly based on caring, concern, and real connections to the other members, gives her the foundation to question the dolls, to not feel ugly or undesirable because she does not look like them.
- In contrast, all that truly unites the Breedloves is a circle of violence, and often complete neglect.

When Claudia is given a white doll, she does not want, she destroys this doll and dissects it. She feels repulsive. She is revolted physically and also at the same time, she is frightened of the white racial features of this doll. She goes on to recognize that she was expected to appreciate this doll as a model of beauty. This was the same model of beauty which was upheld by magazines, by window signs along with girls and women of every age. However, she could never accept the doll as being beautiful.

She also did not conform to the conventional beauty standards proposed by the dominant race of the society. We can also say that the two families, the two matriarchal families have contrasting family stories. Claudia belongs to a caring family in which members have deep real connection. On the other hand, Breedloves follow a circle of violence, and complete neglect often.

- Claudia is one of the strongest characters in the novel who remains unaffected by racism and sexism.
- When she finds a group of boys harassing Pecola, she attacks them. When she learns that Pecola is pregnant, she and her sister come up with a plan to save Pecola's baby from the community's rejection.
- Claudia makes sure to point out that when such things happen, our greatest folly is to blame the victim and to claim they had 'no right' to be alive in the first place. She makes note of the fact that this kind of thinking is wrong.
- But in the instance of Pecola Breedlove, it is too late to correct it, as the damage is already done.
- The white aesthetic and the cycle of abuse she is involuntarily brought into, have already destroyed her.

Even though Claudia is a girl, contrary to our conventional understandings, she is the strongest character in the novel, who is always unaffected by racial or sexual prejudices of other people. When she finds a group of boys harassing Pecola, she attacks them fearlessly. When she learns that Pecola is pregnant, she and her sister come up with a plan to save her baby, even though the community has rejected her.

Claudia makes sure to point out that when such things happen, our greatest folly is to blame the victim and to suggest that the victim has no right to be alive in the first place. In the instance of Pecola, however, it is already too late to correct it, the white aesthetics and the cycle of abuse she has been involuntarily dragged into have already destroyed her mental strength.

- Melissa R. Sande remarks, “While these concluding lines (of the novel) are devastating, and are mournful of Pecola, they also indicate that Claudia has learned from the mistakes of the previous generation, including the rejection of the white aesthetic, and that she recognizes the error by the town and the larger nation in ignoring the plight of a young black girl exposed to sexual violence before she is even a teenager.
- “Because the novel ends with Claudia’s observations and lessons learned, and because she is narrating and imparting such to readers, to a large audience, the novel ends on an encouraging note for the next generation of young women” (Sande, “Female Subjectivity, Sexual Violence and the American Nation in Toni Morrison’s The Bluest Eye,” <https://www.lancaster.ac.uk/luminary/issue4/issue4article6.htm>)
- Morrison projects hopelessness as well as hope through her use of gender blurring.

The novel ends with Claudia’s observations and she also records the lessons she has learnt. But because she is a narrator and is passing on certain information to readers to a large audience, critics like Melissa Sande conclude that the novel ends on an encouraging note for the next generation of young women. So, Morrison has projected hopelessness as well as hope through her use of gender blurring.

- The concept of Gender-Blurring in Morrison’s novels generally attributes weak female character traits to men, and strong male character traits to women; consequently impairing manhood and opposing conventional restrictions.
- In the context of Afro-American servitude it is Toni Morrison’s aim to show the inhumanity of slavery. Both women and men were denied the existence as human beings while being enslaved by White masters.
- The concept of Gender-Blurring therefore functions not only as a blurring between the male and the female gender but also functions as a blurring between human beings, and reinforces the impression of how terrible life must have been under slavery.

If you look at Morrison’s novels in the perspective of the concept of gender blurring, we find that she has attributed weak female characteristics to men and a strong male characteristics to women. Consequently, impairing the conventional understanding of manhood and thereby, opposing conventional restrictions on women.

In the context of Afro-American servitude, it has been her aim to show the inhumanity of slavery. Both women and men were denied the existence as human beings while they were enslaved.

The concept of gender blurring functions not only as a blurring between the male and the female gender; but also functions as a blurring between human beings and reinforces the impression of how terrible life must have been under slavery.

We would continue our discussion of general-blurring in some other novels of Toni Morrison in the next module, looking particularly at this description in her famous novel Beloved. Thank you.
